All of this was clear enough to graduate by the late 1960s, but to the general public, nothing of the 1950s it was much less so. The planning was not always clear. Yet Wright’s house of the 1940s and later should be seen as an architecture of technology and of technology, lying a sheet and greenery in an idyllic, white or semi-rural, natural landscape of the 1950s and 1960s. In some cases, these ideas were expressed through the use of simple, straight lines, creating a sense of space, openness, and light. This house, this way of living, is one that has been widely recognized and admired. It is a house for today and for the future.

Confront Building

CONSTRUCTION
Tulou, the residential building mainly made of earth in China, are located in Yongding, Wupin, Shanghang, Nanjing, Pinghe, Huaan and Zhangpu in Fujian Province. Its style, decoration and building techniques are rare to see. With raw soil as the main material, Tulou also mixes fine sand, lime, glutinous rice, brown sugar, bamboo chip, batten, etc. And the building is built by the process of kneading, pounding and pressing. Durable burned tiles are used to cover the roofs. Fujian Tulou is made up of four or five storeys, where three or four generations of one family live together.

Theo Bosch (1940-1994) was a student and office associate of Aldo van Eyck from 1971 to 1983. He was also one of the most important post-war exponents of the Dutch modernist housing tradition. He and Aldo van Eyck were the architectural pioneers of the urban renewal movement around 1970, which led to a radical turnabout in Dutch public housing policy.
