

Ana Grgić graduated from the Faculty of Architecture in Zagreb in 2000, where she completed her doctoral dissertation in 2011. After three years of work in an architectural office, she started working at the Faculty of Civil Engineering, Architecture and Geodesy in Split, first as a professional associate, and then as a research assistant on the project "Split Architecture 1945-2000." She is currently an assistant professor and head of the Department of Urban Planning and teaches courses at the undergraduate and graduate levels in Architecture and Urbanism. The most significant areas of interest in her scientific work include researching urban planning methods in Split during the 20th century within the framework of practice and broader historical and theoretical frameworks, as well as open public space and its manifestations in the discourse of planning, design, and implementation. She has been actively involved in international cooperation since 2006 and has participated as an organizer and mentor in numerous international workshops held in Croatia and abroad. As an editor, she has worked on professional publications and annual editions of academic years. As a collaborator and leader, she has participated in Tempus and Erasmus+ projects and has taken part in urban planning and architectural competitions with award-winning works. She actively engages in professional work that touches not only architecture and urbanism but also interior design and graphic design.
